

The Leave of Absence Experience and Business Impact Report

The number of companies offering paid leave benefits continues to grow every year. In 2020, a survey by SHRM¹ found that 55% of employers provided paid maternity leave, 45% provided paid paternity leave, and 35% offered paid extended family care leave.

By 2023, 70% of employers had recently added new paid leave policies, including more vacation time (50%), mental health days (48%), and company-sanctioned sabbaticals (23%), according to our recent survey².

More than ever, paid leave benefits are seen as a necessity by many employees, especially because there are no federal policies for paid leave in the United States.

As a leading provider of leave management solutions for over 10 years, we wanted to understand exactly how paid leave programs are impacting everything from recruitment, retention, and ultimately the overall employee experience.

We found that for companies to stay competitive, it is becoming critically important to not only offer paid leave programs, but also manage them well.

If you were to apply for a new job, how important is it for your employer to offer paid leave as part of the benefit plan?

If you were to apply for a new job, are you more likely to apply for an open position that lists the position's paid leave benefits in the job description or clearly on the organization's website?

Understanding the Employee Leave Experience

How well a leave of absence is handled can impact the employee experience in many ways — from morale, to productivity, and even long-term retention. A clear, well-considered leave process is more essential than ever. Employees feel supported instead of stressed and confused, managers and co-workers know what to expect, and everyone is on the same page for the return to work plans.

Most importantly, however, good leave processes will help your organization stay compliant with FMLA and other state leave laws. No one wants to inadvertently cause a DOL complaint that could evolve into audits or costly lawsuits.

Here's what we learned from employees that had recently taken a leave of absence:

In both good and bad leave experiences, the leave process itself was a central driving factor. Confusing and unclear leave processes were a top driver of poor leave experiences. However, clear leave processes and supportive managers were key predictors of a good leave experience.

- Half of those surveyed requested leave from their managers, making manager training on leave programs essential.
- 85% of respondents felt comfortable requesting and taking a leave of absence.
- About one in ten respondents experienced one or more issues with their leave, including miscalculated pay, benefits problems, and even losing their job.
- Positive leave experiences boost morale, improve productivity, and increase loyalty.
- Clear leave processes and supportive managers had the biggest impact on positive leave experiences.

In Their Own Words

In our survey, we allowed respondents to let us know more details about their leave of absence, and why it was or was not a good experience for them. Here is what they shared.

When a Leave of Absence Goes Poorly

"It was just horrible. They did not want me to leave. They canceled my benefits. They also kept calling during my scheduled time off. I had to honestly turn off my phone for a couple of days. Then, when I got back no one was ready for my return."

"I just felt unsupported, like I was just a minion for the company, and not a human with a major loss."

"There was no guidance from HR regarding paperwork."

"It felt unfair that the pressure was on me to continue to return before my leave was officially over. I should not have been contacted as often as I was (or at all), while I was out."

"The woman in HR had no clue about the process."

"My manager harassed me saying I didn't have cancer. And this was after I submitted my diagnosis paper to prove it."

When a Leave of Absence Goes Well

"It makes me feel secure and love my job more."

"I have an enhanced feeling of job security after taking time and returning to work to be welcomed back warmly by colleagues."

"When I got back to work from my leave, my teammates and manager welcomed me back right away. This made me feel really good, to be back as part of a team."

The importance of paid leave is growing, with more employees seeking it out proactively in their job searches. Employees are also growing more comfortable requesting and using their leave benefits, while companies are offering more and different leave benefits to attract talent.

About This Report

For this report, we surveyed two groups of people. The first group was 600 people who were actively looking for a job or had conducted a job search in the past two years. We wanted to know how much leave programs were impacting their job search efforts, and what leave benefits were the most important to them.

Then, we surveyed 600 full-time workers at large companies (5,000 or more employees) who had taken a leave of absence within the last three years. We wanted to know about their overall leave experience, and what impact it had on them after they returned to work.
